REPORT.

The report of 1873 announced the union of the Herrick with the Central Dispensary, and the merging of the two medical staffs into one. Under the new regime, the work has proved most satisfactory to all connected with the Dispensary, and has resulted in a wider usefulness for the institution. More and better work has been done than in any previous year, and greater benefits have been extended to the sick poor throughout the West Division of the city.

The whole aim of the staff has been to perform the duties of the Dispensary, according to the spirit of the organization, viz: To furnish medical services, with medicines, gratuitously, to the sick and destitute poor of West Chicago, and to them alone; taking due precaution to prevent imposture, but in doubtful cases giving the applicant the benefit of the doubt. Those able to come to the Dispensary are treated in its rooms, and all others are promptly and faithfully attended at their homes, by the visiting physicians.

With such attention always freely granted for the merest asking, many are saved from protracted illness, and made able to gain a livelihood, who, with large families often, must otherwise become burdens upon the public expense.

Not the least among the benefits of the Dispensary are those of vaccination, which is made an object of special duty; and as access is had to the very class of people in whom it is most likely to be neglected, and among whom small-pox is proverbially prevalent, it is believed no small influence is exerted in prevention of this disease.

In the financial management, the most rigid economy is practiced in every particular: no expenses are incurred for objects not vital to the institution. The services of the staff are gratuitous, it being a rule of the Dispensary that under no circumstances shall any fee be accepted for any professional labor.

Yet the successful operation of such an institution must necessarily be attended by a large expense. The income from the endowments of the Dispensary is insufficient for its support, without curtailing the amount of good it accomplishes. Hence, it becomes necessary to ask contributions from the public; this the friends of the work are always emboldened to do, conscious of the beneficent character, as well as the measure of the labor they perform, and being ever ready to account to the donors and to the public, for the correct use of every gift.
